income, the social behaviour of the students can have an important effect on their habits.

All these findings signal the need for further empirical research on the causal relationships among the multiple dimensions of life-wide learning, since learning is a dynamic and continuous process. Research that can be conducted among students from different departments can be suggested in order to get hold of an overview of higher education students’ life-wide learning habits.

References

