may help teachers improve their teaching and facilitate the learning process in their classroom.

The advantage of our study was the observation of many different aspects of emotions, especially the situations triggering teachers’ emotions. On the other hand, the one-person observation of teachers’ emotions may be subjective, and represents a weakness of the study. Further research could combine observations with teachers’ self-experience and/or students’ emotions.

References

